

The speaker will consider how protocol designers have in the past, and can in future, help or hinder the work of the network manager. He will examine the fundamental requirements of network management and the limited tools that are available to achieve them. He will look at some existing protocols and their manageability and suggest lessons that can be learned for the development of future protocols if they are to be welcome on production networks.