

As traffic in communication networks originates more and more from data applications, the realisation of communication infrastructure based on packet-oriented techniques has become a strategic target, posing a number of advantages in terms of flexibility and utilisation, but also a large number of technological challenges. In the European IST research project DAVID, a possible architecture for an optical packet switch core and metro network has been defined and examined, and is currently being evaluated in a test-bed set-up.