

History suggests that the successful introduction of technology is usually accompanied by major changes in organisational structures and patterns of work. How true is this of teaching with technology in higher education? Can technology be used incrementally, without disruptive change, or will teaching and the organisation of the university have to undergo radical change to achieve the benefits of technology? And what would be lost as a result?